David Morriss

Minority Counsel

When he retired in 2005 after a 26-year military career, Morriss, 49, thought it was a logical choice to cross the Potomac for a job on the committee. He had worked closely with the panel as the director of the Navy's Office of Legislative Affairs and was familiar with its broad range of issues. He was also impressed by its membership roster -- which now includes two former Navy secretaries -- John Warner and Jim Webb, the two senators from Virginia. "Charlie Abell [former majority staff director] once said that working in the Senate is like a narcotic," Morriss said. "It's just the thrill of working here." Morriss grew up in northeastern Tennessee and graduated from the Naval Academy. He received a law degree from the University of Virginia and a master's from Harvard. Peter Levine, the panel's majority counsel, applauds Morriss for his ability to work across the aisle. And a former colleague called Morriss a "top-notch, A-1 professional." Morriss said he relishes the pace and nature of the work. "You get up in the morning and read in the paper about something you might be working on that day. And you go to bed and read in tomorrow's paper about something that you did."
